History

The area of Washington Heights was originally inhabited by the Wiechquaesgeck, a Lenape tribe, until Dutch colonists conquered the area. During the Revolutionary War, this land was primarily used for Fort Washington in defense against the British Army. In the 1800s, wealthy New Yorkers had land and houses there, including the famous nature painter John James Audubon. Part of the area he owned is now referred to as Audubon Park. In the early 1900s, as settlers expanded upwards in Manhattan, Washington Heights developed quickly and became a home for immigrant groups such as the Irish escaping the Potato Famine, and later, German Jews escaping the Nazi regime.

At this time, Washington Heights was home to Hilltop Stadium, the first American professional baseball stadium, where the CUIMC campus now stands. In the mid-20th century, the neighborhood was home to many famous jazz musicians, including Duke Ellington. In 1965, Washington Heights was the site of the assassination of Malcolm X. More recently, Latin American immigrants, especially those from the Dominican Republic, have become the predominant population.
